Monthly Magazines have opened a way for every kind of inquiry and information. The intelligence and discussion contained in them are very extensive and various ; and they have been the means of diffusing a general habit of reading through the nation, which in a certain degree hath enlarged the public understanding. HERE, too, are preserved a multitude of useful hints, observations, and facts, which otherwise might have never appeared.—Dr. Kippis.

THE various and lively character of the English periodical publications is indisputably unrivalled, not only in America, but in Europe ; yet as domestic patronage in England is sufficiently liberal to govern the views of their editors, English Magazines abound with matter, which loses all its interest, out of the United Kingdom. To procure, therefore, what delights and instructs us, on this side of the Atlantic, we have been obliged to purchase much, in which we could not have the most remote concern. This has been an objection, and the only objection that has been experienced, in the republication of entire English periodical works in this country ; and it is this, that we proposed to obviate by our present plan. Having secured a regular supply of the most popular productions of the Magazine class, issued in England, our first object is to select such of the contents, and such only, as are calculated to interest readers in the United States.

But the exclusion of merely local matter is not the only improvement we have had in view. Notwithstanding the acknowledged merit of the London Magazines, a perusal of any one will satisfy the most ordinary critic, that they contain papers and dissertations of various merit. The Athenæum has the peculiar and obvious advantage of embracing the most elegant, interesting, and instructive productions of several rival publications, without "their imperfections on their head"...such select specimens of genius, erudition and research as must please in any country, where refinement prepares the mind for sound instruction and chaste amusement.

In an experiment on our plan, we have now completed the first volume of our Excerptæ, and confess ourselves fully gratified with the candour and encouragement which have attended our exertions. The novelty of the undertaking, and a natural fear of something unpleasant, particularly in controversial politics, subjected us, at first, to the necessity of letting the appearance of the publication establish its claims on public patronage. If this judicious caution rendered our enterprise hazardous, in the commencement, the result has given us better grounds of confidence, than could have proceeded from gratuitous favour. The flattering increase of our Subscribers, we are persuaded, has not been produced by our promises, but by an examination of our successive numbers.

Yet we are not so inflated by the approbation which this compilation has received, as to presume there is not still room for improvement. The abundance of matter before us gives ample scope for nice discrimination. Progressive familiarity with our duty, we trust, strengthens our capacity to perform it, while our own judgment is aided by an attentive regard to the enlightened taste of our readers. Our middle course, between papers too erudite for general interest, and paragraphs too trivial for the respectability of such a selection, must become more distinct from experience.

By issuing a number, consisting of forty pages, large octavo, in the beginning and middle of each month, we have been enabled to put our subscribers in possession of the work earlier than it could be published in monthly numbers. The satisfaction which we understand has been derived from this prompt circulation determines us to continue the same plan. Eight additional pages of London paragraphs, appended to the last number of each volume, and eight of indices and title-page, will increase the number of pages annually to about one thousand.

To those who are swelling our list of patrons, we take this opportunity to return our cordial thanks; and not less to those, who by the public expression of their approbation have extended the knowledge that such a publication exists. We can now, without hesitation, announce that it will be permanent, for the sources from which we draw are inexhaustible, the encouragement which we receive is decisive, and the present bright prospects of our country promise an increasing partiality to such literary works, as depend on the views and interests of no party, and are addressed to the good feelings and cultivated taste of the community.
